

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

LB 273 417

GREEN LEAVES

LIBRARY
OF THE
UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA.

GIFT OF

Mrs. E. J. L. Scales Green

Class 985

G795

JUL 30 1903

THE AUTHOR

E. J. L. S. Green.

Green Leaves

POEMS

BY

Elvira J. Loring-Scales-Green

of Watsonville, Cal.

Illustrations by

PEDRO J. LEMOS

"We do not choose the pathway
Which with weary feet we tread,
But are by a wise Providence
Through life's great mystery led."

—A Bachelor's Letter

PACIFIC PRESS PUBLISHING CO.

OAKLAND, CAL.

Gift of

Copyrighted 1903 by Mrs. E. J. L. Scales-Green.

To

MRS. F. A. LORING

My dear friend
for her encouragement and help in writing this little volume
I lovingly dedicate this work

111287

LIBRARY
OF THE
UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA.

GIFT OF

Mrs. E. J. L. Scales Green

Class 985

G 795

JUL 30 1903

Contents

California	76
Ode for the Opening Exercises, etc.	79
To the Native Daughters	80
A Tribute to Ceres	81
Toast to Pomona	83
Truthfulness	83
Courage	85
Grandpa's Glasses	86
Discontent	88
Taught by the Fairies	89
Pledge to the Three Graces	91
Words on Reading the Lines, "Sorrow's Crown," etc.	92
The Secret Chamber	98
The Marrying Widow	95
Woman's Rights	97
To Let	100
What's in a Kiss?	102
What Is Love?	103
My Cranky Clock	104
To Friends Declining an Invitation to a Banquet	106
Old Shoes	107
Money-Bags	109
If He But Had My Wisdom	112
The Sea	114
Rain	115
October	116
Cider Apples	117
Pen and Ink	118
The Old Black Sheep	120
The Fellow	123
Forgive	124
Sunset	125
The Valley of Silence	126
No Creed	128
December	129

Alone I stroll by the low, restless sea,
And list to its tones of sweet mystery.
Solemn and sad, or buoyant and glad,
Read we the waves by the moods of our minds,
Till echoes are borne on the wings of the winds.

Lovingly wooed by the glint on the waves,
Reminded of requiems said at the graves,
Ever and always with music so sweet,
We all of life's elements blindly entreat,
"Oh, who holds the key to this sobbing refrain?
Will some great interpreter kindly explain?"

"What chases our sorrows and swallows our woes,
Till grief and all discord dissolve like the snows,
And ever a restfulness lulls o'er the senses,
As the sweet, loving hand of a father dispenses?
Oh, who will this mystery kindly unfold?
It's wrapped in the ocean depths, fold upon fold."

A Soldier's Letter

I write to you, dear Mary,
Write, giving back your vow;
For I think, perhaps, that you
Would like your freedom now.

This life, so full of changes,
Brings sadness to the heart;
And the change that time has wrought
For us must tear our lives apart.

It's cost me many a struggle,
But I would fain be strong,
And not commit against you,
Dear, a great and fearful wrong.

For life is not a pastime;
Don't let your heart deceive,
Or for a moment once forget
That I've an empty sleeve.

So I give you back your promise,
But until life is o'er
The treasures of those bright, fond months
Shall memory hold in store.

But the dreams that I permitted
My fancies then to weave,
Are all dispelled, yes, quite dispelled,
By this swinging, empty sleeve.

My love shall be unchanging,
Your life unfettered, free,
And all I ask, dear Mary, is
That you'll remember me.

And in each day's devotion
Pray, and with faith believe,
For him who, through life's toilsome way,
Must wear this empty sleeve.

Sound

How much of life's enjoyment is ever to be found In the little waves of music, which we designate as sound.

When wakened in the morning by the singing of the birds,

Or loving, varied accents of sweet and kindly words,
Did you ever think to notice just the difference in life
If aroused by sounds of discord, of turbulence and strife?

The meadow lark gives pleasure with every joyous thrill,

While every note is plaintive from poor, lone whip-poor-will.

The rippling stream, the cooing doves, the droning of the bees,

The sighing winds through forests, the raindrops on the leaves,

Each holds its lotted measure of rich and joyous
sound,

Till earth is filled with treasure with which sea and air abound.

There are tones of cordial greeting, and friendly,
social cheer,
Which, though told in foreign language, are pleasing to the ear.
How the ringing shouts of laughter from some little stranger boy
Will waken through our being a sudden sense of joy!
Earth holds no sweeter music than the laughter of a child;
Who dare to frown upon it are worse than creatures wild.

When the halls have long been silent, how it fills the heart with dread
To hear the well-known footsteps of some lordly tyrant's tread!
'Tis thus we note the changes, like the ringing of the bells,
And learn the different language with which each its story tells.
Oft the source of bitter anger or the cause of joy profound
Can be traced alike to discords or harmonies of sound.

Unwritten Music

I would list to a song of music,
To a song that's all our own;
Just speak the words which compose it,
I will only choose the tone.

No studied rules are needed
For a transport of delight;
I've caught it from the whispered winds,
In the stillness of the night.

Though the music was all unwritten,
It oft came between the bars,
And the mystery of translating
Is a secret with the stars.

Words treated of many a subject—
But the tone was always love.
My heart is restless and yearning,
Like the captive carrier dove.

Still, I know, when this weary waiting
Is forever at an end,
That our souls will be united
In that harmony which blends.

So I will try to be content
With this echo in my heart;
And, although unwritten music,
Of that song it is a part.

Sweet Memories

Wrapped in a coat, dumped in a heap,
On a lounge in the office I'm trying to sleep;
Not a sound breaks the silence, awaking my fears,
But memory is busy with past buried years.

Like mists through the valley preceding the rain,
A troop of sweet fancies are flooding my brain.
I see the brown hilltops just flecked with the snow,
And fancy a presence I once used to know.

There thrills through my being a rapture of bliss,
And just one brief moment I'm happy with this;
I know the deep joy which you could not control,
For I was allowed just one glimpse of your soul.

It came all unbidden, flashed up through your eyes,
For truth has no semblance wherewith to disguise
A foretaste of heaven which to angels belongs,
When time and eternity merge into songs.

Sweet rapture in living frail mortals attain,
Which Fate in his turning doth ruthlessly maim;
These bright, golden moments, so wholly complete,
Sweet memory alone has the power to repeat.

So real are my fancies, I see your dear face,
And ask that it follow to sleep's sweet embrace.
Oh, say not forever that memories must die,
But bring this dear scene when I last close mine eye!

If granted this prayer, then the change will seem sweet,
When I sink to rest in the long, dreamless sleep.

Nancy and Joe

Nancy was raised in the city,
But married plain, country Joe.
She chose from the whole profession,
And surely she ought to know.

How they ever got acquainted
Is something strange to me;
But she was plump and pretty
As ever she could be.

While to Joseph's manly qualities
A woman couldn't be blind;
If you searched the whole creation,
His equal was hard to find.

I suppose Joe tried to please her,
Taking that wedding tour.
She dreaded the thing like mischief,
And wasn't happy an hour.

She said, "If only the fashions
Had a bit of common sense
I'd have stayed at home with Joseph,
And saved that great expense."

But she didn't have the courage,
Those blissful, dreamy days,
Though she'd rather have the money
In forty different ways.

The old front fence is nearly down,
And sadly needs repairs;
The wide front hall looks like distress—
No railing on the stairs.

The roof leaks on the cow-shed
(We'd planned to build a barn),
But when I spoke to Joe that night,
He "didn't care a darn."

She would rather have had a carriage
Behind those spanking bays,
But she won't find no time to ride
These busy working days.

She's brought a grand piano
(I wonder when she'll play);
She'd better lock the thing right up,
And throw the key away.

Joe asked me what I thought of her.
I answered, "Can she cook?"
Joe said, "You bet; for I will buy
A splendid buck-eye book."

Perhaps I'm some to blame myself,
And put it in his head,
But Joe is awful fussy
About his cakes and pie and bread.

In book lore I am ignorant,
I've studied men, instead;
If you have a bit of comfort,
Depends on how they're fed.

Well, things run smoothly on for months;
I done the bigger part,
Until I caught her practicing
That new game called Delsarte.

In anger and surprise I said,
"If you've your senses found,
You'd better take the dusting brush
And sweep the cobwebs down."

She said that I was country green;
I called her city smart,
And asked her what she thought she'd find
A reaching for high art.

I took my clothes and went away
To visit Sally Ann,
Though we expected company
And another hired man.

I stayed away a month or two,
And then I started back,
And learned a lesson as I rode Upon that railroad track.

Besides conductor, engineer,
And brakeman on each side,
We had to take a fireman,
'Fore ever we could ride.

When I got home I found that Joe
And Nancy'd had a duff.
Although she'd cooked her very best,
Joe called it "horrid stuff."

I didn't take no notice,
Just asked them how they did;
Poor Nancy looked all jaded out,
And went away and hid.

Then I asked Joe if he should build
His new barn right away;
He said that he had tried to find
A carpenter that day.

Why don't you build your barn yourself,
And thus you'd save the pay?
The lumber all lies on the ground,
And has been there since May.

Joe looked surprised, but merely said,
"We hav'n't any tools;
And if we had, about this work
These men are pesky fools."

"Looks likely you can't build a barn
With lumber all sawed out;
Your father built a house of logs,
And he weren't half so stout."

"Now Joe," I said, and riz right up,
"You can yourself select,
For I've brought home a little book
Which they call Architect.

"Now Joe," I said quite earnestly,
"You practice on the barn,
And let Nan go to cooking-school;
I'm sure that she could l'arn.

"A seamstress, laundress, dairy-maid,
A nursery girl and cook,
You'll scarcely find combined in one,
And so you needn't look.

"Times keep a changing for the men;
Folks didn't use to fail
When they cut their grain with sickles,
And thrashed it with a flail.

"All day they plowed with oxen,
Made the children's shoes at night,
Or mended harnesses instead,
If they could have a light.

"Those days men worked contentedly,
'Thout carrying sich sail;
They didn't sit up half the night
To read their daily mail."

Here Joe broke in, and tried to tell
How Nancy burned her cake,
And how she fussed about the stove;
It smoked and wouldn't bake.

That when she brought it on for tea,
They found it wasn't done;
And when they tried to cut it
Was when the fuss begun.

Nan said she never, never saw
Such dreadful, dreadful wood,
And just declared she couldn't cook;
Joe said his mother could.

Nan said she envied Adam's wife
Far, far above all other,
For surely he could never brag
To her about his mother.

Since Adam's day all human folks
Have a little love and strife;
But where's the man, I'd like to know,
Who'd live without a wife.

I Used to Sing

I used to sing an old, old song,—it's somehow slipped away,—
And, strangely as it now appears, it's haunted me
all day.
I sung this song most sweetly in the merry month of May.

The words I've quite forgotten, but the chorus runs
this way:

"Oh! the old men they are old, and the old men
they are gray;

But the young men they are so full of fun,—
Away, old men, away—away, old men, away."

Life seemed just filled with sunshine, no shadows crossed the way;

My feet kept time to music, as lambkins skip and play;

My bounding heart with rapture leaped to greet the opening day;

And with the birds most happily I sang this roundelay:

"Oh! the old men they are old, and the old men they are gray;

But the young men they are so full of fun,—
Away, old men, away—away, old men, away."

The time has kept on turning, shadows fall across
the way;

And I have kept on singing, but have changed my tune, you'll say;

For what about the young men, oh, the young men of to-day!

There's none that's worth a nickel till they're sprinkled well with gray.

Oh! the young men they are young, and the young men they are gay;

But there's none that's worth a nickel till they're sprinkled well with gray.

Alas! I learned my song too soon, as lassies of to-day

Are thinking that the chorus runs quite right the other way.

Oh! when they've learned their music, and through glasses truly see,

'Tis then they'll change their chorus, and quite with me agree,

That young men they are young, and young men
they are gay;

But none are worth a nickel till they're sprinkled well with gray.

The truth has long my story proved, no matter which they say;

If strains are kept in harmony, there's music anyway.

It's when old maids and widows sing they count the old men gay,

And get the time in discord, and mix things every way.

Oh! the old men they are old, and the young men
they are gay;

But though neither's worth a nickel, yet they'll have them either way;

Yes, they'll have them either way.

Faith in God

I sit in the twilight, musing, living o'er the silent past,
And dear, familiar faces come vividly and fast.
'Tis hushed, no bounding footsteps will frighten them away;
Ah! they gather not so closely in the tumult of the day.

There's one dear face among them I would single from the rest,
With loving arms would clasp him once more to my aching breast.
In his life, in the hush of twilight, I taught Christ's prayer anew,
Of God, the all-wise Parent; he wondered, "Can it be true?"

I told of His loving-kindness, that He doeth all things well,
That those who implicitly trust Him shall one day
with Him dwell.
In those bright days of sunshine, 'twas easy thus to say,
"I'll trust the all-wise Parent; He surely knows the way."

But when our darling sickened, when he suffered so with pain,
And they said, with awe-struck faces, "He will never walk again,"
Then came a cloud like midnight, shutting out my faith in God,
For I thought that one so trusting needed not His chastening rod.

Years, all fraught with life's deep anguish, passed to find him crippled still;
While I murmured night and morning, "Guide me by Thy sovereign will."
In the mystery of silence, he has vanished from my sight,
But oft I feel his presence in the shadows' changing light.

Thus I sit and wait and ponder, asking here with bated breath,
"Is the mystery of living folded in the shroud of death?"
Still I ask with vain repining that a miracle repeat,
For I find that I am listening for his crutch upon the street.

My Love

My love, she is not the fairest,
Judging by the molded clay,
But her grace and kindly manners
Hold me subject to her sway.

From her eyes sped cupid's arrows,
Just to wound my aching heart;
But the music in her laughter
Brought far more than healer's art.

In her sweet and subtle presence
I have found such countless worth,
That it's far above comparing
With the sordid dross of earth.

Sweetest, dearest of earth's treasures
Is the gift of human love;
All the one that we are promised
We shall bear to realms above.

Going Home

To-day I go home, and can hardly wait
For these few last hours to drag;
I've counted the months and counted the weeks;
Then over the days I bragged.

But since this day peeped up in the east
It has seemed interminably long;
Sometimes when I'm looking at the clock,
I think it's decidedly wrong.

But now it is five, and the train makes a start,
And I shall be moving along;
Although I am silent, demure, and shy,
My heart is in tumult of song.

It is not this going, this speeding away,
And constantly changing of motion,
That quickens my pulse, and kindles my eye,
And fills my heart with emotion.

It's not just leaving the dull, old town
(For I have had pleasure and profit,
And found many friendships decidedly warm,
And so have no reason to scoff it).

But I am so happy to know as I go,
When the train pulls up to the station,
That friends will be waiting, with glances of love,
And ended will be my probation.

I shall hear the scamper of glad little feet,
And the cry of exultant joy;
And meet at the gate, where they lovingly wait,
My wife, my girl, and my boy.

One Winter Night

On a winter night, both clear and cold,
I saw a sight that I've never told;
But, if I tell it now to you,
You'll never question that it's true.

I sat by the fire in a quiet nook,
And in my lap held a lovely book,—
Or it held me with close attention,—
The flight of time I need not mention.

But it had slipped far into night
Ere I roused myself in half affright,
And yawned and thought to shake the fire,
Then arose, intending to retire.

"I must for caution turn the key,
And just peep out, in hopes to see
Some other light as late as mine,— Excepting where they're selling wine."

The moon was out in silvery light,
And just across, within plain sight,
An object was—so very strange
It held me spellbound by the change.

Though there so plainly in full view,
Whether it were persons, one or two,
Or whether it were none at all,
It looked so much like a huge ball,

"It is a mystery," I said.
It at that moment raised its head.
It is a man, a Hercules,
And some one with him, I believe.

And thus they stood; while I stood thinking,
"They're some men, likely, who've been drinking,
Or boon companions, mischief plotting,
Their shadows on the snow-drifts blotting."

And thus I stood in wonder gazing,
The objects seemed so quite amazing;
What can it be that goes aright
In these small hours of the night?

Wonder of wonders! if I'm human,
Part of that object is a woman.
"It's plain; I understand," I said,
"Just why it was he lost his head,

"To catch her words, or gain by stealth
Some kisses for the little elf."
I wondered then I'd been so stupid,
For any fool would know 'twas Cupid.

He dallied there full half an hour,
As he were still in Eden's bower,
At his old game in public marts,
Where most successful swapping hearts.

She, little Hebe, could hardly stand,
And he held close upon each hand.
Sometimes, as they would change position,
I plainly saw her opposition.

Ah, ha! she understands her art;
She's aiming at his very heart;
Although she seems to be unwilling,
Well knows she that her looks are killing—

But what has broken on their spell
But the faint sound of sleighing bells.
Their hurried lips in kisses meet,
And he goes flying down the street.

And through a side street he has gone,
And all that way is clear as dawn;
While she moves on, demure and slow,
As if she'd come alone just so.

The horseman, in a swell box-sleigh,
Came swiftly, and I heard him say,
"O Christine, now this is not fair;
I searched the ball-room everywhere,

Till some one said you'd run away;
You know I'd take you any day."
But she just simply said, "Good-night,"
And quickly fled from out of sight.

But many a night, when lamps were out,
I've seen her come and look about,
As if she'd lost some treasure there,
Which she was searching everywhere.

And ere the leafing of the trees
I saw her meet her Hercules,
Who claimed her as his only mate,
As if the thing were planned by fate.

He fumbled in his pockets then,
With all the awkwardness of men,
And said, "Christine, I have the ring
Which I assured you I would bring.

And now we'll go and find the parson,
And help him Hymen's knot to fasten."
While Pete, poor Pete, the man who missed her,
Consoled himself with her half sister.

For Decoration Day

To-day marks a mile-stone in the weary lives
Of women who once were brave soldiers' wives;
And, though the heart breaks, they hope and they pray
That some one will decorate those graves far away.

Moving Shadows

I can see some moving shadows as they glide upon
 the wall,
And presume these silent pictures are familiar to you all,
People riding in a rocker, like a ship upon the sea,
A well-grown man and baby that is plain as it can be.

The shadows seem quite happy as they're swinging to and fro;
I fancy there is music of a song we all well know:
"We'll live and love, my little one, and never mind
 the weather;
You're just as good as daddy wants, and just as sweet as ever."

The shadows now are kissing, as back and forth
 they go;
The swaying, gliding motion is plainly getting slow;

Four hands are linked together, as one can plainly see,
And the little baby shadow has a foot upon each knee.

Now the shadow takes a tumble, little head just sweeps the floor,
Till gurgling, choking, laughing, it is righted up once more.
The great arms now are folding that little one to keep,
And music must be changing to a lullaby of sleep.

Ah! they're doubled up together, till they look like one huge ball,
As with forward, upward motion they float across
the wall;
I rise to follow after, lest I lose their kind "Goodnight,"
And am kissing those two shadows, ere they vanish
from my sight.

An Invitation to John Doe to a Patriotic Party

We're going to have a party (say George Washington and me);

If you get an invitation, the elite you'll surely see.
And when you see our party, you'll pronounce it just immense,

For, when we get to blowing in, we never count expense,—

With beer and oysters and champagne and chicken
fricassee,

If any patriotic man will lend the cash to me.

At the old house on the corner that's known as Poverty Flat;

The rooms are rather small, I know, and poorly furnished at that;

But we'll have such martial music,—a fife and big bass drum,—

That all the neighbors thereabout will think we're surely some,—

With beer and oysters and champagne and chicken
fricassee,

If any patriotic man will lend the cash to me.

I've been studying how to invite you, and wondering if you'd come,

Calculating on the expenses and where I can borrow the sum.

We number just four hundred—every one is on the square—

And the cream of high society will every one be there,—

With beer and oysters and champagne and chicken
fricassee,

If any patriotic man will lend the cash to me.

Just bring your last enamorer; she'll think you're in the swim,

And will judge you have the ducats by the way you blow 'em in;

For a patriotic party is a very swell affair,

And you'll never count expense, nor miss of being there.

All those who are not invited will surely feel the slight,—

While we who are strictly in it will claim it's out of sight.

So just come on, let's whoop her up this twenty-second night,

And show our loyal patriotism as social, shining lights,—

With beer and oysters and champagne and chicken
fricassee;

I think you are the very man to lend the cash to me.

The Turned Picture

I grew a fair and sturdy youth, my days were full of dreams,
I chased the shadows and the lights along the pebbly streams;
And time rolled on, the years went by, unheeded
as they passed.
I know, as I look backward now, they flew by all too fast.
I changed from boy to manhood, and chafed beneath its cares;
Oh! often were forgotten my mother's earnest prayers.

Though reckless as a sailor, my hand knew not a crime,
But slander tossed my name about with many a scornful chime,
Till at last I grew defiant, and wished the world were dead,
And, like all other prodigals, upon such husks I fed;
Then wearied, worn, and suffering, I sought the old,
old home,
Where shielded, warmed, and welcomed, I hoped no more to roam.

But change had wrought such havoc, I scarcely knew the place,
And felt its very shabbiness added much to my disgrace.

There was no response of welcome; they wished me
truly dead,

Though I have never learned it from any word they said;

But through their cold indifference, in so many cruel ways,

Until the darkness of the nights was brighter than the days.

One day I sought my mother's room, where all our pictures hung,

And where so oft in former days I round her knees had clung.

Upon its walls I fondly gazed, and plainly counted
all;

But one hung in the shadow, with its face turned toward the wall.

The clods of earth more kindly fall on our untimely
dead,

Than acts like these by kindred hands, where hearts are crushed instead.

This froze my heart, and never more their sympathy
I'll crave,

For all the rights of kinship are buried in the grave.

So now I roam the city round, with no abiding-place,
And drink my wine and lager, to drown my old
disgrace;
For the love for one's own kindred grows wonderfully small
When he finds that his own picture is turned face toward the wall.

Maple Leaves

Uncle Sam has sent his postman with a package to my door;
I wonder what the thing contains, as I quickly glance it o'er;
It's a most uncommon parcel, with a swelling on its side,
Like a wart upon the finger, which one vainly tries to hide.

It's wrapped and tied securely with a cord so strong and thick
I'm sure I can not break it; please bring the scissors quick.
It's cut, and from its contents falls, all strewn upon the floor,
Such wondrous tints and colors it has never held before.

"Ye skirted 'long the river banks, and grew upon the hill,
And waved your beckoning shadows towards the old forsaken mill."

—Maple Leaves.

All amber, brown, and scarlet, and lights of silvery sheen,
With splashes of golden sunshine, all mixed with shades of green.
Here's a magical inscription,—ah! a pass to "long ago,"
And there rises, like a mirage, all the friends I used to know.

I see the dense, old forests, with their ever-varying shade;
Ye were their crowning glory, through every dell and glade.
Ye skirted 'long the river banks, and grew upon the hill,
And waved your beckoning shadows towards the old,
forsaken mill.

Where once, in autumn's afternoon, I found you all alone,
And then and there I claimed you, my love, my very own.
The radiant light of sunset glowed on every shrub and tree,
When you raised your hands and gathered some maple leaves for me.

These seem like long-lost treasures from out the buried past;

I have their very counterparts locked away, secure and fast.

We pledged our troth in silence, 'neath the old mill's sheltering eaves,

But our lives have been as varied as these gorgeous
maple leaves.

I fancy that these leaflets grew upon that selfsame tree,

Were gathered late by loving hands and forwarded to me.

With splashes of brown and amber, just a little light and shade,

They live but one brief season, and just as quickly fade.

Ah! a love that is inconstant fills the heart with bitter pains,

And leaves our lives as checkered as these gorgeous maple stains,

All amber, brown, and scarlet, with a little tint of flame,

Which death's frost uses always, wherever he writes his name.

A forest without the maple leaves is sombre, dark,
and chill,

As life without our loved ones is harder and heavier still.

I hailed each dear old landmark
As though it were a friend,
The fancied welcome I could feel
Which they must surely send.

A BACHELOR'S LETTER

So of all the leaves in the forest, through the north,
the east, and west,
The gorgeous leaves of the maple I'm sure I love the best.

A Bachelor's Letter

Dear Jack, your letter came to hand
Two months ago or more;
I have delayed from time to time,
Now wish the task was o'er.

Should I attempt to answer
All the queries that you ask,
'Twould be to you unprofitable,
To me an arduous task;

So I will answer what I deem
Is best that you should know,
And you'll excuse your uncle, Jack,
This rambling style below.

It's true I am a bachelor,
And very odd, you say;
My eyes are losing luster,
My hair grows thin and gray.

Why thus I choose to journey on Through life's uneven way
Is to yourself a mystery
Quite unexplained, you say.

We do not choose the pathway
Which with weary feet we tread,
But are by a wise Providence
Through life's great mystery led.

I had my spring-time years ago,
Of promise rich and rare.
I wooed and won my Mabel;
My promised bride was fair.

But I was poor and much too proud
The toiler's hill to climb,
And asked my own sweet Mabel
To wait till wealth was mine.

For rumor told that gold was found
Upon the western coast,
Where man could make his fortune
In two short years, at most.

I said, "I'll seek this promised land
Filled with its hidden treasure,
And in all the future years, Mabel,
Your wish shall be my pleasure."

To-night comes back that dear old scene—
That last night on the beach.
How pain and grief at parting
Saddened the heart of each!

The same sweet moonbeams linger
O'er ocean, rock, and peak,
But shadows in the valley
More slowly seem to creep.

I sit in silence, living o'er
The deep and mystic spell,
And o'er me comes an influence,
From whence I can not tell.

But I am wandering far away
From my intended track;
Perhaps, I'm getting tiresome,
Had better hasten back.

I journeyed to the land of gold,
And reaped a goodly fill;
But, coming o'er the isthmus home,
Dame Fortune played me ill.

For weary months I lingered there,
My hope of life near fled;
In after years they told me
They mourned for me as dead.

Oh! the deep, the sad dejection
I felt upon that day
When I learned my fortune all had gone
In some mysterious way.

Then I arose with weary feet
To retrace the toilsome track,
For I could not, with all my pride,
Come empty-handed back.

Thus I worked, I toiled, I delved,
And, wearied, sought my cot.
One night I had a strange, wild dream,
Which I have ne'er forgot.

My mother bended o'er me
With looks divinely fair,
A crown of amber lightly lay
Upon her golden hair.

Her hand upraised a banner;
These words I plainly read,
"Poor boy, poor boy," the banner said,
"You knew not what you sold
When you exchanged your happiness
For yellow, shining gold."

I raised to clasp my mother
And grasp her shining light,
But she had gone I knew not where,
So noiseless was her flight.

Here I was seized with wild unrest
To seek my native shore—
But, Jack, dear Jack, I can't go on;
How can I tell you more?

The good ship seemed a laggard
Upon the surging tide;
For I was quite impatient
To meet my waiting bride.

At last we neared the harbor
That e'er was dear to me,
"This is my ain, ain countrie,
This town beside the sea."

I hailed each dear old landmark
As though it were a friend;
The fancied welcome I could feel
Which they must surely send.

They stood like warning sentinels,
Solemn, unmoved, and fast,
And told in silent language
Of a dead and buried past.

Where once grew briar and bramble
In thick and matted hedge
The town(now grown a city)
Came to the water's edge.

The hurrying crowd, the tumult,
Spoke vividly of change;
All seemed to be familiar,
And yet exceeding strange.

Among the throng of strangers
One dear, familiar face;
Eagerly I questioned him
Of people 'bout the place.

But when I asked for Mabel
His eyes diffused with tears;
He grasped my hand, and whispered,
"She's been a wife for years.

"But you're in time to see her,
And say the last good-by,
For Mabel's days are numbered,
And she must surely die."

The scene within her chamber
I'll draw the curtain o'er,
And only tell you of her child,
That played upon the floor.

I've watched her happy childhood,
Her sweet and artless youth,
And long before you knew, Jack,
I had divined the truth.

Your letter held just one surprise
Which bade me see you wed,
That was its touch of tenderness
For old, gray Uncle Ned.

I'll come to see you married,
And greet your loving wife,
Wish you both a glad New Year,
A long and happy life.

And when I come away again,
If she would know me more,
Just take my letter down, Jack,
And read its contents o'er.

Say when I look within her eyes
I see her mother's face,
An image dwells within my heart
Which I would not efface.

And when I'm done with earth life,
We hope to meet above,
Where we shall have perfected
This dream of human love.

Wishing and Doing

I borrowed the pen of a genius—
In my fingers its language was dumb—
I besought, I implored of the muses
To honor my prayer and come.

I asked an exalted position,
And wished for a high-honored name,
With joy and peace as companions,
Then expected the glories of fame.

They laughed as with scorn and derision,
Till humbly I bowed low my head,
And pained with anguish and sorrow,
I grieved o'er my beautiful dead.

They gave me no hope of achievement,
But showed me that toil was my share,
And, though humble and low my position,
The award would equal my care.

This was said, with a grave look of counsel:
"To the toilers true triumph awaits;
No wine is ere brought from the vintage
Till after the crushing of grapes.

“The true, toiling serf and the sailors
Are equally heroes in strife
With those in exalted positions,
The favored and honored in life.”

What is fame?—Alas, but a bubble
That is swept from your reach by a breath.
Look down, help the weak and the suffering,
And smooth out the pillow of death.

The true poet's soul has felt anguish,
And suffering has kindled his flame,
Whose life is privation and sorrow,
And whose death leaves only a name.

Sonnet to Two Old-Maid Milliners

Poor lonely old maids,
I desire not your places,
Your fashions, your follies,
And all your fine graces.
You'd gladly exchange
Both ribbons and laces
For kisses from lips
That have beards on their faces.

How I Danced

I danced with old Squire Merrill
When I was a little girl.
It seemed so great an honor
It set my brain awirl;
For I was a farmer's daughter,
And he was a man of the world.

With fine and courtly manner,
How well I remember the time!
His son was giving a party,
For he was grown a man.
If I close my eyes this minute,
I can see just where they stand.

In the parlor of his mansion,
He and I were to lead the set.
He said, with a stately deference
That I never can forget,
"You have your choice of music,
If you wish to name this dance."

I answered with an awkward smile,
A quick and startled glance;
Said he, "We'll take the Money Musk,
Just to see how well we feel,
And if you can't go through it,
We'll change it to a reel."

With this they struck the music;
We went whirling in and out.
When the last long set was ended,
His son gave a merry shout.
The squire came quickly forward,
And led me to a seat,

And said, when bending o'er me,
"I'm sure we can't be beat,
So I claim the next cotillion;
It's my last, last dance to-night."
I very quickly gave consent,
For it filled me with delight.

I have since led many cotillions,
And danced in crowded halls,
But the dance I danced with the courtly squire
I'm sure holds over them all.

But time has on kept whirling,
Sometimes all out of tune;
We have too long Decembers,
And all too short a June.

I'm now an old, old woman,
And the courtly squire is dead,
Yet in my heart the echo lives
Of the kindly words he said.

The Fiddle

Last night I heard the fiddle,
As it creaked beneath the bow,
And brought to life the same old tunes
I danced by years ago.

Ah! how he thumbed that fiddle,
Till it set my brain awirl!
And time rolled backward, till again
I seemed a thoughtless girl.

The room grew old and rustic,
With its low and blackened walls,
And I heard the tripping footsteps
With the music rise and fall.

And when he went to calling
All those figures to and fro,
I seemed to see the very boys
And girls I used to know.

The Fisher's Hornpipe, Money Musk,
I asked him to repeat;
For it brought an awful tickling
To the bottoms of my feet.

So when I hear a fiddle,
You would hardly think 'tis me,
To see me up and dancing,
When I own to sixty-three.

Can One Be Robbed?

Can one be robbed of what he ne'er possessed?
I answer, "Yes," to my unquiet quest;
Who's orphaned at his birth is robbed of love,
And misses it as nestlings miss the dove.

Or an unwelcome child, who comes to earth,
Is robbed of love long ere he has his birth,
And finds life's road a lone and dreary way,
For which the gift of life can scarcely pay.

Unwilling hands may soothe his infant breast;
He'll miss the love that prompts the fond caress.
Unjustly robbed; Oh! dearth of childhood's years;
Oh! bitter stings and sobbing heart-felt tears!

Ye wives who eschewed love and married dross,
Must pay the price, your children suffer loss.
Who's crippled at his birth, or mute, or blind,
May feel his nature's God, at times, unkind;

But greater is the loss of love than sense
To sensitive hearts; alas! far more intense.
Eternally the curse must follow sin,
As love with happiness remain a twin.

But let us hope that time will compensate,
And living prove a long progressive state;
That the vast future of evolving years
Will prove that smiles can take the place of tears.

Dreaming

In flush of youth, when hopes are high,
Ere clouds obscure the morning sky,
With sturdy feet and buoyant tread,
Our young lives by ambition fed,

We roam the hills or search the plains,
Fully assured of worldly gains,
And only ask that time may fly;
For we will sure old care defy.

The future, wreathed in sunny smiles,
With witchery the time beguiles.
Oh, blessed days of only seeming!
Oh, golden years of midday dreaming!

What possibilities we conceived!
What wondrous things we each believed!
Phantoms they proved with fleeting youth;
Your love remains a living truth.

Of all life's joys I e'er shall know,
This follows me where'er I go,
And comes again, forever new,
Fresh as the flowers with morning dew.

I sometimes mourn o'er dreary ways,
Till memory brings those blissful days;
Then living only is a seeming,
And I am happy in my dreaming.

My Vision

In sadness I murmured all through the long day,
And grieved that my darling was taken away.
I asked, almost wildly, "Why could he not stay
To cheer and to brighten my wearisome way?"

And thus through the long day I murmured and wept,
Till nature, o'erwearied, gave way, and I slept.
Then came to my vision a beautiful scene;
The site was a landscape that bordered a stream.

But out on the landscape confusion was spread,—
The lives of the living, the graves of the dead;
Helpless infants were there, with wild, wailing cries;
The feeble, the aged, I heard their deep sighs.

And eager youths grasped at the foam of the tide,
Unheeding the chasm that yawned at their side;
While men much too early for old father Time
Came, bowed down by sorrow, by care, or by crime.

And pale, wasted women, o'erburdened by care,
Each jostled the other—the throng was all there.
“This scene of confusion, of bustle and strife,
Is earth’s panorama and journey of life.”

Thus sung a sweet voice, seeming close at my side;
I searched, and soon found it came over the tide.
And thus as I wondered and waited to see,
The minstrel arose, and came over to me.

The face of an angel could not be more fair;
That calm, holy look no mortal could wear.
I knew that my darling had come to me now,
With the heaven-born peace beaming forth from his brow.

Smiling sweetly, he said, “Now look at your child;
Can you wish I were back on the landscape wild?”

I gazed at the vision, so fair and so mild,
And answered, "No, darling; oh! no, my sweet child."

"Oh! now, my dear mother, when I float away, Remember I came here to brighten your stay."
Thus saying, the dear one glided over the stream,
But long could I trace there a lingering gleam.

Oh! may the gleam brighten this sad life of mine,
And strengthen me on through the journey of time.
Then came this sweet message, just wafted to me,
"Remember your blindness; God only can see."

The Childless Mother

Well may a childless mother weep,
With sobs of anguish, low and deep,
When death calls all her loved ones home,
And leaves her here, indeed alone.

Oh! stricken heart, so blindly led,
So vainly seeking beauteous dead,
Is there no helper? there no God?
No light beyond this senseless sod?

No balm or cure for human woe,
Oh, where can human reason go?
Death has, at least, one deathless charm,—
They've passed beyond all mortal harm.

And never more they'll feel the woe
Of erring, weak ones here below.
Oh! think of those condemned through time,
Or linked with those all steeped in crime.

'Twere easier far to let them go,
Than see them plodding thus below.
Though childless, who would call them back,
And see them bound to torture's rack?

Or sunken to the depths of shame,
Of wearing here a blighted name?
Oh! who would court the cruel fate
Of seeing love all turn to hate?

For death is not the worst of ills;
It never once affection kills.
Why question, with our human sight,
The wisdom of the Infinite;
Or dare to lengthen out the span
That is allotted here to man?

Grief

The sky is all shadowed, all nature's in gloom,
The silence of midnight pervades my low room;
I hear the soft wind as it sighs through the dell,
With a cadence of grief which words can not tell.
It breathes through my soul a refrain like its own,
While from my pale lips escapes a low moan.

For my poor heart, o'ercharged, having long sought relief,
Has fled for one hour to indulge in its grief.
I've battled it long, long begged it desist,
But it comes with a power I can not resist;
It has beat down the barriers I builded so high,
And the guards at the portals now prostrated lie.

Hope is crushed, joy dead, and my soul draped in gloom;
But no one must know that my heart holds a tomb;
For they must arise, like a Phoenix, at dawn,
Their semblance, at least, o'er the sepulcher drawn.
'Tis vain, though at present I bid it be still;
It sets at defiance my governing will.

And I sit here in tears, as if weeping had power
To wash away blighting and bring back the flowers.
The few that bloomed bright in the pathway I trod
Are gathered long since in the gardens of God.

'Tis well that the sky is o'ershadowed and gray;
I'd rather have shadows than sunshine to-day;

For ungenial glitter its keen arrows sends,
Like gazes of strangers at funerals of friends.
I fancy that nature, with sobbing and tears,
Has wept with her children these numberless years;
And undefined sympathy seems trailing therein,
As the curse followed swift in the footsteps of sin.

In hours such as these, grant power from above,
Dispel the dark clouds with undying love;
Oh! raise up the spirit to communion with Thee,
For, Father, the burden seems heavy to me.
I murmur, alas! at our dim human sight,
While humbly I bow to acknowledge Thy might.

Sonnet for a Young Lady's Album

When the fingers of Time
Turn the pages of life
With rapid, changing fleetness,
May you gather from its pages, rife,
The treasures of its completeness.

Questioning

When pain clings so closely that question we must,
Is dying all death? must we pass into dust?
When earth's light grows dim, and the pulse ebbs
 away,
Will nothing be left but cold, passionless clay?

Oh, that something beyond would its radiance lend,
Assuring poor mortals the grave's not the end!
These shadows of darkness relentlessly fall;
Each moment of time brings the deep sable pall,

Till all of earth's children are powerless to save,
And cry, "Hath Almighty a power o'er the grave?"
All restlessly seeking the one hidden goal,
All question alike the life of the soul.

The whispers are borne on the unanswering breeze, Reverberating ever are questions like these:
"Shall I pass forever from under the rod?
My soul feel forever the sunshine of God?

"Will the dear long departed come close to the shore,
And smile a glad welcome, and beckon me o'er?
Will the spirit, untrammelled, delight in its power,
Unfold with new beauty, like germs of a flower?

“When friends that have loved me through sunshine and gloom
Are gathered around in the death-shaded room,
Will the spirit of mercy come down in its might,
And bear me aloft on its pinions of light?”

“Or will life, with its cares, its ceaseless commotion,
Close over my grave, like the waves of the ocean,
Till the limitless future and far-reaching past,
Together, relentless, are swept from my grasp?”

Doubt whispers, “It may be.” It may be; and yet
I’d not be forgotten; I would not forget.
Oh! Father, dear Father, give light from above,
Assuring poor mortals of infinite love.

There Is No Death

“The old, deserted mansion, built of clay,
Is silent now, and ready to be borne away.”
Thus mourned the dear ones, as, with softened tread,
They came to look once more upon the silent dead.

“Oh! ruthless, unrelenting death,” they cried,
“Thou hast our all, yet ne’er art satisfied.
Why make them stark and dumb? they can not hear,
Or feel our touch, or know when we are near.

Oh! pitiless, Oh! cruel death," they cried,
"Is there no life, no light, upon the other side?"

* * * * *

By accident I lost the subtle power of breath,
And passed into that state which mortals here call
death.

There was for me no struggle, no sickening sight,
For death had come, as one snuffs out a light;
Though dread, incomprehensible is death in any light,
Beside decrepit helplessness 'tis a far more beauteous
sight.

Of every mortal sense I was bereft,
And yet far greater powers than all I now possessed,—
Sweet, sacred gift we miscall intuition;
It's only truly learned on the border-land transition.

No finite mind can comprehend, or hope to understand,
The beauties of immortal life within the spirit-land,
As by power of single thought I glided o'er land and sea,
Although the power of human touch had gone far,
far from me.

Soft as the summer sunlight falls upon the waters,
Or the love of human mothers for their daughters,
Or grateful sleep falls o'er the wearied senses,
Thus came the greater gifts which death alone dispenses.

We know no more of discord; that is left with mortal clay;

And the presence of our loved ones brightens all our heavenly way.

Thine Eyes

Thine eyes are ever fond and tender,
With love-light so trusting and true,
Outvying the stars in their splendor,
More radiant than morn's sparkling dew.

Chorus—

I own their full power to enthrall me;
You may smile, you may fret, or may sigh,
If e'er I acknowledge I'm vanquished,
'Twill be by the light of your eye.

Oh! they hold more than depth of the ocean,
By having full power to impart
The silent, but living emotions
That stir in the realm of your heart.

Chorus—

When troubled, they follow through daylight,
With restless, unspeakable woe,
Invading the silence of midnight,
And haunting me where'er I go.

Chorus—

When joyous and hopeful and happy,
Their magical powers give delight,
Till the boys about town say I'm sappy,
I'm longing so much for their sight.

Chorus—

Moving Pictures

If I could paint upon the air,
I'd show you scenes, both dark and fair.
The first should be a country scene,
Of children sporting on the green.

You'd almost hear their shouts of glee,
I'd bring them out so forcibly;
You'd see their kites all flying high,
And larger boys should play "I spy."

Some girl should dance as May-day queen,
As happy as a midday dream.
These lovely sights would youth renew,
While older eyes these scenes review.

I'd change the scene, and quickly then
Would take you to the pauper's den;
Such miseries I would portray,
You'd quickly turn the other way.

But it would surely move your heart,
Cause tears to eyelids softly start,
To see these suffering ones of earth,
Demented from their very birth.

From such a scene in sorry plight,
You'd calmly view a broad street fight;
But you would gladly come with me
To happier homes of harmony,

There to behold the loving wife,
The center of an honored life,
Who, with noble husband, proud and grand,
In loving words gives each command.

Here happy children kindly meet,
And gladly all their joys repeat.
Then, just for contrast, I'd unfold
The habitation of a scold,

Whose nodding head and shaking fist,
And words made strong with emphasis,
Have kept in practice from a girl,
And turned her husband to a churl.

She still insists it is his dues,
And gives her good man fits of blues;
Her children rise and run away,
And longer we'll not wish to stay.

Sure, 'tis a picture in which no art
Can bring to view the saddest part.
Then, as kaleidoscopes will turn,
I'll take you where the camp-fires burn,

And show you soldiers as they stand,
Their drilling and their marching grand;
You'd see each column move along,
Like measures of a written song;

You'd see them wheel from left to right.
Oh! is not this a stirring sight?
Just see their glittering uniforms,
Which well their persons doth adorn!

From canteens now they sip their drams,
But all their battles shall be shams;
And after all this show and play,
You'd see them come and draw their pay.

You'd see their quick and buoyant tread,
And almost hear what each man said.
I'd paint this scene so very fair
No other picture could compare.

For I would put far, far away
The pallet where the wounded lay;
So while you looked you'd understand
That man had learned this great command:

That evermore all strife be stilled,
And nevermore shall man be killed;
And the picture be like a passing play,
From which you'd tire and turn away.

And turning, could not fail to see
The triumph of the toiling free;
For here behold where want is dead
And starving multitudes are fed.

Oh! is not this a grander sight
Than ever canvas brought to light?
If I could well this scene portray,
Its memory would live on for aye.

Then would I paint the morning light
As it dispels the darksome night;
A lovely scene I'd bring to view,
And, best of all, it should be true.

You'd hear the murmuring streamlet flow,
For I would trace it to and fro
With such marvelous gift of tracery
That he who looked would, wondering, see,

Whatever country he doth own,
The nearest brook to childhood's home.
Its witchery would bid age retreat,
And old-time joys would all repeat.

Then, close beside the murmuring stream,
He'd list again to love's sweet dream;
He'd see the maid and lover meet,
And hear their voices, low and sweet;

He'd catch the gleam of loving eye,
And waking say, "Oh! one was I."
Thus, as I'd paint, you would behold,
And proclaim me an artist bold;

For these sweet pictures, all in one,
Would show what wonders love has done,
And teach us all to love the more,
While toilsome days are passing o'er.

And then for chidings look to self,
For little faults creep in by stealth,
Through all the journeyings and strife
Of every human being's life.

Where now are groupings dark as night
There should be scenes of beauteous light,
Which, like Jacob's ladder built in cloud,
Speak to the inner sense aloud;

Giving to all a keen delight,
While teaching us to live aright.
Love is the choicest gift of earth,
The only treasure of priceless worth.

The Open Well

I've been out to grandpa's, and all through the hay-mows;
 I've searched through the low eaves, where the barn swallows dwell;
I've romped through the meadow and down through the wild-wood;
 And heard all the stories that Aunt Hannah tells.

I asked if she knew 'bout that "old, oaken bucket,"
 The "iron-bound bucket," that once hung in the well.

She said, "'Tis the sweetest, the dearest old story
 That ever with music from human lips fell;
But there is a shade which the painter and poet,
 If he were a woman, he surely would tell,
Though it might mar the picture, and thus spoil the music,—
 He'd speak of the faults of that old, open well.

He'd tell how old puss and her kittens got drowned (’Twas quite unbeknown to us for a spell, Till the water grew foul, and we thought it was poisoned;
’Twas not fit to be used, we found out by the smell).

Then we fussed and we fumed for these modern improvements,
And called it hard labor to draw from the well
With “the old, oaken bucket, the iron-bound bucket,
The moss-covered bucket, that hung in the well.”

When alone one must cook and brew for the workmen,
Do out the week’s washing for the household, as
well,
Then wait on the door-bell, and tend to the baby
(I’ve done it myself, and I surely can tell).

There is not much to sigh for, not very much in it,
This drawing the water from out the old well;
For overwrought muscles bring painful emotions,
And mar the beauty of which poets can tell.

If the bucket still swung at the well, you would pass it,

And drink of the water that runs through the faucet;
You'd mourn not, nor sigh, for the days that are olden,
But rather would own that the present is golden.
Yet all do agree 'tis the sweetest old story
That ever with music from human lips fell,
'Bout that "old, oaken bucket, the iron-bound bucket,
The moss-covered bucket, that hung in the well."

The Statue of Memory

In each heart is a secret chamber
Where the statue of Memory stands,
On which golden letters are burnished
And wrought by tireless hands.

All woven around are inscriptions,
In varying light and shade,
Of daring, delightful achievements,
Deep cuts of our blunderings made.

Here Cupid brings garlands of roses,
To embellish the neck of a dove;
Joy and Innocence (sweetest of cherubs)
Have enshrined it the symbol of love.

With secret and untiring labor,
Which time can never efface,
So fine and intricately woven
That only your vision can trace,

Hope modestly brings some bright links
For the beak of this beautiful bird.
And smiles o'er her unfinished labor
With each low and sweet-whispered word.

How royally regal her person!
How brilliant and sparkling her eye!
She faithfully toils on with patience,
Though toils, alas! with a sigh.

Faith works more slowly, till weary
She tries many wonderful arts,
Quite often dissembling unwisely,
And blindly concealing some parts,

Till Sorrow and Anger together
Arise and put out the bird's eyes.
She opens her beak in her anguish,
With wild and low, plaintive cries.

Those beautiful links now are worthless,
All scattered and broken in twain;
And Despair comes, creeping in slowly,
And looks in her eyes for the pain.

Joy wrathfully scans the deep injury,
Faith murmurs a hasty good-by,
Then seeking the dove in her anguish,
Together they suffer and die.

We smile while we carry their coffins—
The world is what we most dread—
And the statue of Memory grows heavy
With beautiful, unburied dead.

California

Read at the Breaking of the Ground for the Midwinter
Fair Held in San Francisco, Cal., in 1894

California, bright gem by the ocean,
Grand laurels are ever for thee,
To bear to the courts of all nations,
Like splendor of sunset to sea.

Your achievements are watched from all quarters.
And welcomed with joy and surprise;
The people look up to your statesmen
For counsel and words of the wise.

Your statesmen are noble and polished,
Your women are fair and refined,
And branches of olives grow sturdy,
With sparkingly-brilliant young minds.

CALIFORNIA

Your laborers all have abundance,
And know not extreme heat or cold;
They are blessed with a large sense of comfort,
Far better than silver or gold.

When we cross the Sierras at midnight,
We lose the old secular year,
And never again find December,
October, and June make our year.

The name Golden Gate seems befitting
A harbor so tranquil and fair,
To a land filled with tropical wonders;
A wish half expressed and 'tis there.

Your beauty and grandeur surpasses
The power of all language to tell,
Enchanting, delighting, bewitching,
As with a magical spell.

Your vast sources of wealth are unnumbered,
And as little dreamed, it may be,
As the mariner sailing the ocean
Little guesses the depth of the sea.

Rich minerals poured into your treasury
Till the world looked on quite amazed;
All languages mixed in the Babel
When sounding a chorus of praise.

Then flocked from all climes and all countries
The sturdy, the valiant, and true;
While under your banner of freedom
Our forefathers' precepts renew.

Let your sons and your daughters accomplish
High, moral, and unselfish deeds,
Till unborn generations shall gather
Rich fruits from your sowing of seeds.

Don't sigh o'er the days that have vanished,
Nor mourn for the heroes all dead,
But point to the men by whose labor
The suffering nations are fed.

Then cut the deep valleys and hillsides
Into homes for the toiling free,
Till the air reverberates with music
From a chorus of state jubilee.

Then hail ye, All honor to Labor,
With Capital close by its side.
Let "Peace" be forever your watchword,
"California," forever your pride.

Ode for the Opening Exercises of the Midwinter Fair

(Held in San Francisco, 1894)

Oh! welcome, thrice welcome, to this "City of Palms,"

Where nature has lavished such bountiful charms.
Unfurl wide the banners, open gateway and door,
To welcome with honor eighteen-ninety-four.

A centennial century, stark on its bier,
Has vanished forever; its triumphs are here;
While long strides of progress, from stage on to stage,
Have brought us triumphant this magical age.

Two can talk through a telephone just for two bits,
Till one or the other has exhausted his wits.
They do away space with the telegraph wire,
By sending a message where'er they desire.

Oh! one can not mention the numerous ways,
But who would e'er sigh for his grandfather's days?
The crown of all blessings is peace and good-will;
A dead, stagnant peace, isn't down on the bill.

But born of high purpose and power to achieve,
What can hands not accomplish that heads can conceive?

Though skeptics all said it was written on air;
We never should witness this Midwinter Fair.

But, thanks to all those who have worked with their wills,

And thanks to the heroes who tapped their own tills,

'Tis the marvel of marvels to civilized nations;
Its like's not been known since the world's first creation.

So to time and these people, the rich, great, and small,

With pleasure and honor we welcome you all.

Where this Midwinter Fair and its praises are sung,
May you hear through its chorus the name of "De Young."

To the Native Daughters

California's fair daughters, I bow to your shrine;
Accept with indulgence this tribute of mine,
Most favored of all upon this round earth,
To claim this fair state as the land of your birth.

Rare tropical fruits in abundance are here;
Sweet-scented roses bloom all through the year.
And where choice fruits of nature profusely abound,
The loveliest women are sure to be found.

You were cradled in comfort, shielded from harm;
While witchery wove each such magical charm
That kings are not honored more proudly than he,
In being a parent to daughters like thee.

You were nurtured with culture, were guarded with care;
While nature has lavished a bountiful share,—
With charms has bedecked you, so grandly complete,
From the crowns of your heads to the soles of your feet,

That I ask here in wonder, “Where under the sun
Will you find fitting mates with the proud native sons?”

Any man of high honor who looks for his peer
Must acknowledge at once he finds she is here.

Far above rubies, rare diamonds, and pearls,
The wealth of our lives is the smiles of our girls.

A Tribute to Ceres

Dear Ceres, fair goddess of produce and corn,
Your scepter has ruled since creation's first morn,
With power more despotic than tyrant's or king's.
Your frown on an empire keen suffering brings;

No station on earth is exempt from your scorn,
And subjects pay tribute as quickly as born.

"Willing tribute forever and ever," they cry.
While centuries roll on, then languish and die,
You reign on in triumph when their courses are run,
As regally fair as first kissed by the sun.
Fair Flora, sweet goddess in gorgeous array,
Outshines you in beauty a brief, happy day,

Till Time gets enamored, the blundering old churl,
Like a man past his prime with a sweet, laughing girl.

Soon faded and worn, she then seeks your aid,
When you and Pomona both comfort the maid.
Then Pomona holds carnival a part of each year,
But she, too, would perish if you were not near.

Endowed by the Deity, 'tis yours to command;
You nurture all life when you smile o'er the land,
So while these fair goddesses visit our earth,
Your constancy proves your superior worth.

Toast to Pomona

To all the fair Pomonas throughout this golden state,
You ask me here to give a toast, and so I bow to fate.

* * * * *

To all the fair Pomonas throughout this sunny land,
Who wield the magic scepter with a fair and lavish hand,
No matter what the multitude, or when they dine,
or where,
She'll give you all a love-feast, by taking it in pears (pairs).

* * * * *

There! I knew I could not make a toast; it is scorched or underdone,
And just turns out (I knew it would) a very simple pun.

Truthfulness

(Written for a small boy)

You can guess at my age
When you look at my size,
But for tracing the truth
You must look in my eyes.

I dwell in two kingdoms,
Whose division between
Is formed by the feelings,
And hard to be seen.

It is a hard matter
To keep them apart,
They're being united
So close to my heart.

While one is called "Evil,"
And one is called "Good,"
I stayed in the better
All through babyhood.

Once, when I grew older,
I told wicked lies.
Up came a good fairy
And winked through my eyes.

Then mama looked down
Through my tears, and saw How wicked I was
In breaking God's law;

Then told me how badly
She suffered beside,
Then opened her arms,
And together we cried.

I resolved at that moment
To become a good man,
To tell the whole truth;
And I know that I can.

Courage

You ask if I have courage;
That I must wait to see;
If one must fight to prove it,
You need not count on me.

If one must run to danger
To show that he is brave,
I think the better action
Is my precious self to save.

But if my little playmates
Ask me to act or tell a lie,
It takes a bit of courage
Their wishes to deny.

Folks used to think the hoe and plow
Developed muscle for the fool;
When one had wit and courage,
The sword or musket was the tool.

The times are always changing,
Yet courage is ever the same;
But many a fainting hero dies,
And the world knows not his name.

When the poor and weak and helpless
Are abused within my sight,
There comes a time for action,
And I'm brave enough to fight.

Grandpa's Glasses

I donned my grandpa's glasses when I was a little child,
And peered above their golden rims. Ah! how my mother smiled
When gently she removed them! I can hear just what she said:
"They are much too wise for little eyes and such a curly head."

I put them on again at ten, with jacket and top boots,
And thought myself a little man; the rest were silly
coots.
I looked above the rims again, and saw my mother
frown,
While sternly she commanded me to lay those glasses down.

I tried them on at twenty; looked above, beneath,
and through,
And thought the world enchanting, with nothing much to do.
But mother said, "Don't loiter round; there's work,
as well as play;
So just get in and rustle; it's much the better way."

I tried them on at thirty; everything was in a whirl,
For everywhere, where'er I looked, I saw some pretty girl.
I looked no more for mother's face; it had vanished
from my sight,
And I could never see it more, except in dreams of
night.

I put them on at forty; things were mixed and truly strange;
I just began to realize how much of life is change.
I put them on, I took them off, was never quite content,
So much of toil, so much of loss, so much of life misspent.

I press them on at fifty; everything looks very plain,
And life seems full and pleasing, as I live it o'er again.
If I should live till sixty—it's not so very far—
I'll put on these old glasses, and look like my own grandpa.

Discontent

My tasks were most distasteful;
I murmured as I toiled,
And through careless inattention
Many were the things I spoiled.

I looked on other's triumphs,
Thinking they were easy found;
While low and menial labor
Held me in its ceaseless round.

I longed for more of pleasure,
I sighed for more of books,
And despised the man above ground
Who first invented cooks.

I was assailed, both night and morning,
By a noisy, hungry crowd,
Who shouted forth my praises
In chorus long and loud.

But this I took for granted,
As every toiler's part;
For none had ever dared to class
Fine cooking as an art.

It was thought to be essential,
And an every-day affair,
And every household mother
Found her full, allotted share.

But I have learned my lesson;
Suffering teaches more than books;
The most exalted labor
Is done by household cooks.

Let every toiling mother learn,
While there's empty mouths to fill,
To do her work with pleasure,
Ere by death their lips are stilled.

Taught by the Fairies

Wearied and worn, and at war with fate,
I sank to rest in a wretched state;
For the day had passed with toil and pain,
For coveted blessings I could not gain.
"Why must I toil and never attain?"
I fretfully murmured again and again.

Baffled and hedged at every turn,
My heart with indignation burned.
Why was I born this helpless thing,
When even a bird has its strength of wing,

Can fly unfettered from shore to shore?
Oh! what do we know of the evermore?

Thus, worn and weary, I sank in sleep,
Where a better power may its vigil keep;
And I was borne by a fitful dream
Along the banks of a turbulent stream,
Till it broadened out o'er a vast expanse,
Where the soft sea waves in the sunshine danced.

There, wildly tossed on the seething waves,
Were wretched things from their unknown graves;
But sprites and fairies would gather the things,
And quickly transform them to beautiful rings,
Or sheaves of wheat, or garlands bright,
Or harps of gold, with strange, new light.

I felt their meaning, though I heard no tone,
"Go gather the things, and weave your own."
"I can gather the wretched things," I said,
"But in my fingers they all seem dead."
"Work with a will; there is a power
That will come to you in every hour.
But watch and work and seek perfection,
For many a piece will need correction."
They left me there, within the reach
Of all those shreds upon the beach.
So now I work, with joy I sing,
Content and happy, for time must bring

The coveted blessings I shall attain,
And love and triumph with me remain.
So when my heart makes bitter moan,
Or, sad and lonely, I walk alone,
My fancy goes to that unknown sea,
And I review the lesson the fairies taught me.

Pledge to the Three Graces

By each golden circle we pledge to the last
A friendship that's precious, enduring, and fast;
So fill up the bumper, and drink while we may,
For life's golden moments are gliding away.

Aye, faith, hope, and charity, each shall have one.
While journeying on toward the far-setting sun;
So fill up the bumper, and drink with good cheer;
The night waneth fast, soon morning is here.

Hip, hurrah! just one bumper we'll drink ere we part,—
The drink, fitting emblem and wish of each heart.
May our lives be as happy, as full, as complete,
Our friendship as strong, and our union as sweet.

Words on Reading the Lines

"Sorrow's crown of sorrow is Remembering happier things."
—Tennyson.

Into whose lives have come happy things,
Remembrance sweet joy perpetually brings.
Beyond measure blessed, thrice happy are they,
Though clouds may o'ershadow on life's rugged way.

Oh, thus but to live for one brief, happy hour
Increases our faith in Omnipotent Power;
Nor can grief or pain bring back the sad dearth
Of which we were conscious ere joy had its birth.
Though stricken and dead, brief its bright stay;
Resplendent in beauty, it lived for a day.
While suffering loss, if still conscious of gain,
'Twill help us endure and triumph in pain.

Murmuring, learn we the lessons of life;
Great joys and great sorrows ever run rife.
Blindly we question the wisdom of God
When we are commanded, "Pass under the rod."

The Secret Chamber

Each heart holds its secret chamber
Where the statue of Memory stands,
All written with varied inscriptions
With a fine, but indelible, hand.

Joy starts with a grand little flourish,
Unheeding where'er he will end,
When Care gives a jolt, and he loses
The beauty and grace he has penned.

Hope climbs to place her inscription
Well above and in front of the rest;
But stumbles and falls, while protesting
Her motives are surely the best.

Faith blindly works, slowly achieving
A beauteous, bright, shining spot,
And insists 'tis the greatest of virtues
The helpers of mortals have wrought.

Love follows along in her footsteps,
And toils with such magical art
That she weaves a glittering circle
Which embellishes every part.

Hate, Envy, and Malice, the trio,
Oft toiling with such eager zest,
Assisted at odd times by Folly,
Soon mar all achieved by the rest.

Grief mourns o'er the wrecks with sad anguish;
She cuts deep into the gloss,
And declares, while reviewing her labor,
"Alas! alas! it's all dross."

But Duty and Patience are plodding
In a dark, little niche of their own,
Where they add to the work done by Pleasure,
As shades to a picture give tone.

Each moment is wrought some inscription,
Though silent and all out of sight.
Oh! happy the days which in passing
Are reviewed with keen pleasure at night.

The Marrying Widow

The following piece needs a few words of explanation. It was written in answer to a granger advertising in the grange that he wanted a wife, and was not particular as to who she was, as his affections were so scattered, and any lady in the grange was good enough. It reminded me of a man who wanted to purchase a barrel of apples, and said apples were apples; any of them were good enough. But when offered russets, said they were good keepers, but he did not like the kind. The next offered were Smith's ciders, and they were too sour; then the maiden blush. "Oh, yes," he said, "they are a nice looking apple, but are apt to be rotten at the core." So I wrote the following:—

I sat by the fire in the dim, fading light,
And thought of that poor, lonely granger's sad plight,
How he wants a young wife, not a chit of a girl, Who'd spend all her time to keep her front hair in curl.

He wants Miss Perfection, that's plain as can be;
And just come to think, she's most exactly like me.
This staggered me some, and I sat quite a spell.
"He may be too young, yet you never can tell."

For look through the world, on its vast population,
You'll see every age in the marriage relation,
Till people might say, "There's a man and his mother,"

Or, "There's an old lady and her younger brother."
So, if his scattered affections should center on me,
I'm as marrying a widow as he'll likely see.

I'm promised by contract to one, two, or three.
You wonder to whom—well, I'll tell you, maybe.
"Then why don't I marry?" Ah! there comes the rub;
Some dear, bright-eyed woman calls each man her hub.

Of course, they all say they were led to the altar
Before they saw me, or their footsteps would falter.

You ask any granger, he will say 't isn't he;
But if he were a widower, you'd see what you'd see.
If the man is past middle age, that's all the better;
He'll want a new wife just to humor and pet her.
So, if his scattered affections should center on me,
I'm as marrying a widow as he'll likely see.

So I move and amend, without the first flaw,
A matrimonial bureau become a grange law.
Ah! I hear that low whisper, "'Tis a good notion."

Don't all rise at once just to "second the motion,"
For if this said bureau should become a grange law,
Then every young lady would invest in a draw.

And all married members would call it intrusion;
That would take up the time, and all end in confusion.

So I'll done with my nonsense ere you rate me a dunce,

And order my trousseau completed at once,
For, if his scattered affections should center on me,
I'm as marrying a widow as he'll likely see.

Woman's Rights

So much is talked of nowadays
Of woman's rights and wrongs,
And studied on the problem
Of what to her belongs,

That I've often thought I'd like to know
Why all this hue and cry,
And why these precious privileges
Our lords to us deny.

For, if one man was not complete
Without a better half,
How can a nation's council hold
Without this prop or staff?

She may, perhaps, lack wisdom
To guide "the ship of state,"
But she need not be the captain.
Just first or second mate;

For there are many offices,
Of county, town, or state,
Which she could fill with honor,
And in time might legislate.

She would not touch the tariff,
Nor steal the extra cash,
But quickly would prohibit
All intoxicating trash.

She would bottle all the grape juice
In unfermented wine,
And sell it to the laborers,
Without licenses or fines.

But intoxicating liquors,
Too poisonous for drinks,
Would find their way to ditches
Through sewer pipes and sinks.

No criminals nor paupers
From any foreign shore
Should land at Castle Garden,
From hence, forevermore.

No foreign prince or syndicate
Should gain, by wealth or power,
Our manufactories or land
To own a single hour.

These syndicates thus forming,
Run by a foreign head,
Now make our beer, and own our land,
And bake our very bread.

I will not tell all they would do,
If women took the lead,
But surely all our voters
Would know how to write and read.

Then capital and labor
Would cease to be at strife,
For equal rights and justice
Would be the rule of life.

But I pause, without alluding
To other errors great and small,
And ask you to extend
The rights of suffrage to all.

To Let

I've a mansion to let,
And, just by the way,
Shall ask the fair tenant
Some rental to pay;
She must love and honor
And likewise obey.

When any young lady
With these terms will comply,
I shall be most happy
To receive her reply.
So now, my dear ladies,
Pray do not forget
That I have a bachelor's Mansion to let.

Answer—

Ah! you've a mansion to let,
And in it would live,
And ask the fair tenant
Three payments to give.
I've a heap of affection,
Which I could bestow,
For a season, at least,
On a mansion below.

I should render the honor,
At least unto you,
For it's easy to honor
Where honor is due.
Of course, you expect
In all business affairs
To furnish the mansion,
And keep up repairs.

In business agreements,
I think it is true,
Till the lease is run out
The last payment's not due;
And then, should I fail
To bring it about,
You'd have the great pleasure
Of moving me out.

So, if the mansion is ready,
And you're not a dunce,
I'll make my arrangements
To move in at once.

What's in a Kiss

What's in a kiss?—"Just hope and bliss,"
They tell us fondly o'er and o'er,
And then with loving words implore
Us to believe there's nothing more.

But one who understands the art
Will tell how kisses reach the heart,
When through the eyes the soul's caress
Conveys a lofty tenderness.

Then through sweet lips will softly steal
The secrets which no words reveal;
They, like a mirror, will impart
The mysteries of a truant heart.

Who would with lying lips deceive
Leaves kisses which in silence grieve.
Let reason share in love's delight,
And scorn deception's lasting blight.

Who'd know the full and free delight
Of truly loving kisses' might
Must keep the precepts of their youth,
For valued kisses smack of truth.

Then they hold more than hope and bliss,—
Hold full content and happiness.

What Is Love

We have met, and, simply meeting,
Passed the common words of greeting.
Glancing at your eye and age,
As one scans the title-page
Of a new and unread book,
Was there magic in your look?

'Twas a strange, mysterious power
That enthralled me from that hour;
But, like the critic, student, sage,
I ask for more than title-page.
Would it disturb this outward calm
Were I to seek the hidden charm?

Disturb it not, as leaf to bower;
Unconscious pride has princely power;
Fineness and fitness well combined
We ever seek, but seldom find;
But when once found, though love be blind
'Twill recognize its own sweet kind.

What makes the waiting heart rejoice
At the sweet accents of a voice?—
'Tis the same law that guides the spheres,
Or controls the source of human tears,
That brings the wind from out its source,
And holds the circlets through their course.

My Cranky Clock

Then seek this law, to us unknown,
Which makes love claim its very own,
And then forget both time and place
While gazing on a loving face.
All hearts respond to music grand
When keys are swept by a master hand.

Where truth and honor are combined
(The rarest gifts from the hand divine),
With conscience guiding a keen delight,
Naught can fill our lives with nameless blight:
For, as the waters fill the sea,
Our little world holds you and me.

Oh, love! life's sweetest mystery,
That brightens all eternity!

My Cranky Clock

My cranky clock sits on the shelf,
And has the brass to run itself.
Sometimes it's fast, sometimes it's slow;
It often strikes, yet still will go.

And when I wind it once a week,
'Twill laugh aloud and nearly speak.
You think I've no reason to thus complain,
But hear me out, and I'll explain.

It must be for the want of strength
Its hours are never quite of length.
Of all the strokes in twenty-four (I've watched and counted o'er and o'er),

The clock and I do quite agree
The longest is from two to three.
Both Jack and I can hardly tell
Which one of all's the shortest spell.

At break of day, from five to six,
I'm sure it makes its fastest ticks;
But Jack avers he'll prove by men
From half past nine to half past ten

Is much the shortest he can trace
Upon that old clock's dial face.
Once that old clock, when I was sick,
Just had a fit and wouldn't tick.

It woke me up in such a fright,—
The time was dead, and it was night,
And it was dark, yes, black as death,—
It nearly took away my breath.

Ere this I had not known its worth;
I thought that clock just run the earth;
But it has taken streaks since then;
I can't tell how, I can't tell when.

106 Declining an Invitation to a Banquet

But Jack comes home, he's had big fun,
Declares that clock has fairly spun.
Now this is the puzzle, as you'll see,
Which is the crank? which of us three?
The clock or Jack, or is it me?

To Friends Declining an Invitation to a Banquet

With this I send you kindly greeting,
And gladly would attend your meeting,
But muddy roads and cloudy skies
And fate decree it otherwise.

Although I can not take each hand,
You'll feel my presence, understand.
Though other tones these words repeat,
Through waves of space our spirits meet.

Most heartily I wish you joy,
Life's blessings all without alloy.
We lightly change from place to place,
But sadly miss each kindly face.

In months of absence how it cheers
To think of long, long, passing years!
What bonds of friendship, good and true,
I have imposed and found with you.

OLD SHOES

And though you miss, when I am gone,
Some strain of music through your song
(’Tis selfish I should wish you pain),
I’m glad you miss my minor strain.

And when again we’re blessed to meet,
Some dear old songs we will repeat.
Now your kind indulgence I implore;
Good wishes send, and nothing more.

Old Shoes

I sit here impatient, my feet on a chair;
There’s something amiss, I just vow and declare;
I never once more will go out on the street
With these horrid, old shoes again on my feet.

They’ve grown so ill-shaped, all stretched at the side,
For more than a month they have wounded my pride;
Some buttons are off, one’s ripped at the heel;
I can’t half express the disgust that I feel.

I’m sure they detract from the rest of my clothes,
The polish all off to the tips of their toes;
They’ve done well, it’s true; I’ve had them halfsoled,
So they’re surely, decidedly, shockingly old.

"Entirely worthless," you've just heard me say,
"So I'll rip off the buttons, and throw them away."
Just here one has seemed to stare up in my face,
And whisper, "Remember we each knew our place.

"We've carried you through some dreadful bad weather
Since we three good friends have been so close together;
The marks on our uppers, the scars on our soles,
Show plainly enough our part on the roll.

"We've quietly watched and measured your paces,
With most constant care kept you well in the traces;
Some blunders we've saved you of which we'll not speak,
By expressing disfavor with a sharp, little squeak.

"Let me tell you one thing, ere you ruthlessly rend
The last tie between us, dear, trusted, old friend;
In your ups and your downs, in your last, reckless races,
We've stood both the rough and the slippery places.

"On one or the other you've thrown your full heft,
And we've seen that your honor has never got left.
When we made your acquaintance, it was a tight squeeze
To keep up connections, you were so hard to please.

"Some time in the future, some long day in June, You'll think, 'Ah, perhaps, we have parted too soon;'

When the corns and the bunions puff out at the side,
And the wretched, old pain has devoured all your pride.

"Then you'll think of the soft, solid comfort we've had,

That in parting so soon you were really half mad,
Or, at least, must have been in a fit of the blues
When you cast us aside as worthless, old shoes."

Money-Bags

I'm living in a little world, not wholly by myself,
For there are many fairies here, and many a little elf;

We're plagued for locomotion, we're limited in space,
And all these pesky little imps keep getting out of place.

I plan some great achievement; on their help I must insist,

But the little scamp called Money-bags is surely to be missed.

I call out grave detectives, Industry looks around,
And soon reports, with gravity, "He's nowhere to be found."

Necessity moves uneasily, and, breathing a gentle sigh,
Remarks, with quiet candor, "You're looking quite too high;"
But Folly joins with Vanity, crying, "Out upon such stuff;"
And both declare in concert, "You don't look high enough."

Imprudence, Sloth, and Envy say, "He's loafing round with Chance;"
While Innocence and Cunning say, "He's out with Circumstance." Indifference says, "Don't worry, we can live for many days,
And get along without him, and plan in various ways."

"Old Lawrence" says, "Don't hurry, you'll find my logic sound;
Just set a trap and catch him; he's sure to come around."
Here Prudence says, "Be careful, don't trust him
long from sight,
For with his protracted absence Convenience feels the slight."

And thus the time is wasted in much argument and strife,

Till the tyrant Indecision is the bane of all my life.
While all are idly waiting Dame Fortune passes by,
For Energy is prostrate; I ask of Reason, "Why?"

The answer is decisive, "The scamp is hard to find;
He's hidden now from Justice, and she's both dumb and blind;
He slipped away from Wisdom's grasp, very much to her disgust;
Has ever since been smuggled in the rings of every trust.

"Let Vigilance and Honesty no longer frauds endure;
Leave Envy, Wrong, and Avarice, 'twill soon effect
a cure.
This would soon correct the rascal, that's grown so overbold,
And show his humble origin; he was always bought and sold."

All are scorning old Necessity; he is his next of kin;
It's downright inconsistent that we nearly worship him,
Right here in our America, it seems exceeding strange,
Where our money was created just for medium of exchange.

MORAL—

If we would do by others just exactly as we should,
Then we'd find they'd do by us just exactly as they should.

If He but Had My Wisdom

If he but had my wisdom, or I possessed his strength,
Such a mighty combination would run through this century's length.

You would see a silver airship that would climb the rainbow's track,
And visit Mar's inhabitants long before it would come back.

There would be hydraulic mining done in minted,
golden showers,
Till fives and tens and twenties fell like raindrops
on the flowers.

You could glide across the ocean with the swiftness of the wind,
And bring from foreign countries gems of every form and kind;

For all the modest mermaids would be quite in love with me,
And bring all their wondrous treasures from the bottom of the sea.

You would see a horseless carriage speeding up and down the grade
That would leave the automobile altogether in the shade.

It's then some new inventions would be running smooth as silk;
You'd be supplied with butter made without a drop of milk;
For I know a fine location which, without a doubt,
would pay—
You would see a large, new creamery, in the unused
Milky Way.

All the crimes would be abolished; there would be no time to run.
Criminals would be apprehended long before their deeds were done.
Then the old man, always watching through the darkness to the light,
Would report to all the papers all the mysteries of the night.

Marconi's talking wonder we could easily eclipse,
For this same old Moony lately gave me several tips.
So, if he but had my wisdom, or I possessed his strength,
Such a mighty combination would run through this century's length.

The Sea

O the sea, the sea! the wild, wide sea,
Is a constant source of joy to me.
Restless, tireless, and turbulent tide,
Fairest of all, thou art nature's bride.

Kissing the sunshine, wedding the storm,
You eagerly welcome both night and morn.
Mountains are silent, the stars quite profound;
Ocean was given both motion and sound.

Source of the raindrops, that earth's verdure renew,
Quickly dispelling volcanoes from view;
Torrents embracing, soon forming a part
Of mystical music, born in your heart.

Storm-driven billows, with beauty wrought,
Ebbing and flowing, dissolving to naught,
Together ye speak of birth and of shroud,
Foam-crested billows so quickly plowed.

Mists from thy bosom, wondrously fair,
Triumphant in beauty, rise through the air,
Cradle of color and rainbow to be,
Born in the clouds, but conceived in the sea.

These constant motions but faintly impart
The life-giving force and throb of your heart.
Forever and ever your wavelets repeat
Anthems both solemn and grandly complete.

Rain

Dark above and black below,
Slush and mud wherever you go;
Mud and slush make the travel slow,
And through the gutters black waters flow.

The house is dumb as with silent pain,
And footsteps hushed by mud and stain;
The wind is stilled to a soft refrain,
As it sobs and sighs through this ceaseless rain.

The crops all ruined, the farmer blue,
His faithful wife in a dreadful stew,
The children caged, with nothing to do,
All, all, alike, wish the rain were through.

But it patters and splashes on roof and sill,
And seems to enjoy its own sweet will,
As it rushes in torrents or ripples in rills,
From the mountain's side or the wooded hills.

The town seems wrapped in a thick, dark haze,
That has long shut out the sun's bright rays;
It has rained for nights; it has rained for days;
Still it rains, and rains, and rains always.

The men all grumble and call it rough,
The schoolboys say it is awful tough,
The girls declare it is horrid stuff,
And we all agree that we've had enough.

Still dark above and black below,
It first rains fast and then rains slow.
Will it ever cease this raining so?
The weather-prophet don't even know.

October

The lovely, bright, and perfect days
Of October now are here,
With all their gathered golden wealth
For the crowning of the year.

The promises of May and June,
With their leafy buds and flowers,
You have fulfilled abundantly,
Through sunshine, shade, and showers.

All the perfumes of the seasons
You have gathered in your fruits;
All the colors of Flora's kingdom
Are woven in their suits.

Every tree in the old, old forests
Has put on its tinted leaves,
In honor of your coming
With your bright and golden sheaves.

While time turns his lunar circles
That the changing seasons bring,
Among these loyal subjects you
Will ever be crowned their king.

Cider-Apples

Cider-apples, cider-apples, cider-apples, if you please, Cider-apples, cider-apples, just the refuse from the trees,
Green, brown, and golden russets, and a few old
Tallman sweets,
Such a wild conglomeration I'm sure one seldom meets.

Cider-apples seem so worthless, all strewn upon the ground,
So wormy, bruised, and rotting, no choice ones to
be found.

What can we do to save them? They're surely of no use,
Unless we manage somehow to just extract their juice.

Let us gather cider-apples, and truly learn their worth
By changing to a beverage well-known throughout the earth.
It's a hard and tedious process, for they must all be crushed
Through a mill in perfect order, without one speck of rust.

Then we have a drink perfected to compare with all the rest,
Most delicious and refreshing, by far the very best.
'Tis then our cider-apples, or apple cider, if you please,
No more is counted worthless or refuse from the trees.

Pen and Ink

I was asked to write a poem and given pen and ink;
"You couldn't write without them," he said, with knowing wink.

"But you don't catch my meaning; you asked me
once to choose.
Just take them for your subject; you will not dare refuse."

So I take them for my subject, just simply pen and ink;
"Queer subject for a poem," as any one may think.
If I should write a letter to a man I can not see,
I know that he'd be happy to get one line from me.

"Twould wake the silent echoes all through his heart and brain;
He'd think the halcyon days of youth had all come back again.
And what would I put in this letter? It seems so hard to tell
Of days so long and lonely, while in health I'm very
well;

That my love has ne'er grown weary through his long and dreary stay,
But my heart is like a bird-cage when the bird has flown away;
That I see his face in dreamland, in silence of the
night,
But it vanishes with shadows in the gleam of morning light,

Making life more pain than pleasure with these meetings of extremes,
Till my life seems only living just these moments of my dreams.
Then I waken with a struggle when I think I hear him sigh;
Again I live our parting o'er and hear his sad
Good-by.

Thus would I fill my letter with sweet nonsense much like this,
And he would know I wrote it and had sealed it with a kiss.
If one could not get letters from their loved ones, who could think
How much sweetness is embodied in the senseless
pen and ink?

The Old Black Sheep

The one black sheep of my father's flock
Would some way get mixed with the other stock;
Although unwelcome and much in the way,
It seemed determined right there to stay.
Its fleece held the marks of hoofs and horns,
While closely embedded were covered thorns;
Burs and thistles were hidden deep
In the wool of this old, worthless sheep.

THE OLD BLACK SHEEP

Till utterly worthless seemed the wool,
Of sticks and briars it was so full;
Yet one could trace a glittering thread,
Which might have improved if properly fed.
But kicked and cuffed and knocked about,
Sometimes fenced in and then locked out,
'Twas not much wonder it went astray;
Poor thing, it knew no better way.

Thus alone, it wandered where
The mountain-tops were bleak and bare,
Until it came to a rippling stream,
And followed it down through the meadows green,
Where it basked in the sunshine of God's pure light,
But felt the stings in the frosts of night.
Sometimes it fared better, sometimes fared worse,
But ever seemed like a thing accursed;

Till at last it sank by the river's brink,
Where the banks were so steep it could not drink.
Oh! is there ever more piteous plight
Than dying of thirst with the stream in sight?
Thus the poor creature suffered day after day,
Till a wandering hunter passed that way.
As suffering creatures move the heart,
So the hunter stopped with a sudden start,
Then doffed his hat in the river's brink,
And brought to the suffering creature drink,

And felt repaid by the dumb surprise
That crept up through the creature's eyes.

Thus was formed a golden link;
Blessed was the hand for giving drink.
Gladly the hunter would have borne it away,
In the mists of the morning, dull and gray,
But the sheep was shocked by the sudden strain
And forced to cry out in its bitter pain.
Compelled to go by the morning light,
He sought her again at shade of night;
But the creature had perished during the day,
And vultures had stripped its fleece away.
So he opened the earth with tender care,
And buried the carcass then and there.

Then he gathered the wool in his haversack,
And carried it miles and miles on his back,
Till at last he came to a market town,
Where experts said it was soft as down,
That gloss and texture were both complete,
For royal heads or for fairies' feet.
So the hunter found when the fleece was sold
That he was rich in his counted gold.
Thus worthy works of human kind
Are often lost to the sordid mind,—
Are like the gloss of this silken thread,
That never was known till the sheep was dead.

The Fellow

I remember well when this face was fair,
Not a thread of silver ran through my hair,
My cheeks and my lips had a ruddy glow
Which only the innocent ever know.

I loved all unwisely, yet far too well;
'Twas the old, old story—I sinned and I fell.
Why tell how I passed that season of woe,
And brought back revenge from the regions below?

When scorned by fair women and jeered at by men,
I vowed that my vengeance should fall upon them;
'Twas thus I sunk low in the vortex of sin,
And long, weary years I traveled therein.

Then came to our den a Samaritan bold,
To bring back the lost ones into the fold.
My God! could it be that I beheld him
Who long years ago had taught me to sin?

With meekness and sorrow he heard my despair,
Then bowed low his head in a most earnest prayer.
He asked the good Saviour to ever forgive,
And grant that, though sinners, we even might live.

I learned from his prayer of God's infinite love,
And peace like a spirit came down from above;
Though bad as he'd wronged me that far-distant day,
I'd sown the same seed all the long, wretched way.

But as I joined in the prayer, "Dear Father above,
Who drowns all our sin in Thine infinite love,"
I heard this plain answer, "Oh! look up and live;
As you have forgiven, I also forgive."

Forgive

If I could write some matchless words
To live when I am dead,
I'd tell where God's most wondrous truths
Are ever to be read.

Not only on the printed page,
Which men in parchment bind,
But traced upon the seething waves,
And borne upon the wind.

In wondrous tints of rainbow hues,
Munificent and grand,
And wrought with beauty on the rocks,
Indelible they stand.

On every tree and hillside shrub,
Whoever seeks can trace,
In every varying shade of light,
Inscriptions of His grace.

In human hearts, where length of days
Is counted by good deeds,
The blinded eyes of suffering ones
Discern them in their needs.

To one who seeks for hidden truths
They ever, ever live;
The grandest of all hidden truths
Is learning to forgive.

Sunset

In cloudlets on the mountain's side
Solemn silence settles down,
Which to my childish fancies held
The terrors of a frown.

Unfathomed were thy mysteries
Of starlit, azure skies;
The northern lights seemed dancing sprites,
And whispering winds were sighs.

Belated cowboys' shouts are heard
From far-off distant hills,
And frightened birds give plaintive notes,
With wild, discordant thrills.

The Valley of Silence

Then quickly hushed to rest again,
The silence reigns supreme;
These are the choicest hours of life,
Which hold day's fading gleam.

When shades of night are falling fast,
The thrushes' notes are stilled,
And hearts, though dumbly praising, are
With adoration filled.

The dew forms on the lily's leaf,
A hush is in the air,
As if the day in dying had Invoked a silent prayer.

Instinctively the child of earth
Is moved to thoughts above,
And through day's changing circles
Claims God's eternal love.

The Valley of Silence

I was brought to the valley of silence,
The dim, voiceless valley alone;
Not a sigh, a breath, or a heart-beat,
Not even the sound of my own.

The hush was so solemn and holy,
And God was so wondrously near,
With great love, so precious and perfect,
I knew not an atom of fear.

He who noteth the fall of the sparrows,
Ne'er loses a small grain of sand.
He gathers the mists into dewdrops,
And divideth the seas from the land.

The stars in the heavens He ruleth,
And none ever fall from His sight.
Can we question the infinite wisdom
And power which forever is right?

He gave His own life to His children;
Thereafter we ever are blessed,
For life is surely eternal,
And death to the weary sweet rest.

No Creed

I have no creed, save this, I know
Where God's pure sunlight falls below;
On Christian, heathen, pagan land,
All worship as they understand.

The greatest interpreter is truth,
In every land of age and youth;
And all by this fine standard given
Must find their way at last to heaven.

Through crooked ways, and journeyings long,
And suffering much from evils strong,
All bow beneath the chastening rod,
And learn at last to worship God.

While groping blindly here below,
We reap alike just as we sow;
And dare we question His great love?
Who rules below must rule above.

While doing here the best we can,
We're working nearest wisdom's plan;
And wait not for a future time
To bring us peace and joy sublime.

December

I'm sitting in the twilight of the dumb, old, dying
year,
And all the earth is barren, so solemn, dull, and drear;
The silent, flitting snowbirds, the sighing of the wind,
Breathe a sad and tender requiem quite in keeping with my mind.

I, too, am fast approaching this old, solemn time of
year,
And the drear, old, dread December will very soon be here.
All my morn was gray and cloudy, with streaks of lighter gray,
Till it seemed but little sunshine would ever cross
my way.

It was well-nigh past the noonday when the sun shone clear and bright,
Enveloping my being in a flood of heavenly light.
As one athirst in the desert will leap at the water's sound,
So my heart, long silent within me, came to life with a sudden bound.

Then I basked in the golden sunshine, unheeding
the flight of time,
A hallowed, passing semblance of a holier and happier clime.
Ah! alas for my sad awakening! the dream has passed away,
But has left a blessed imagery of a higher and happier
day.

While sitting here in comfort, with peace and plenty blessed,
As one after toil and sorrow has a welcoming sense of rest,
At times some dark and somber clouds will flit across
the way,
And make me sad and lonely with dread of a dark, chill day.

While pausing, I look backward through the long and varied way,
With a sense of keen enjoyment towards the twilight's golden ray,
For whosoever is guided by One who is always right
Is sure of a glorious sunset ere the black, December night.

LOAN PERIOD	1	2	3
Home Use

4 5

6

ALL BOOKS MAY BE RECALLED AFTER 7 DAYS.

Renewals and Recharges may be made 4 days prior to the due date.

Books may be renewed by calling 642-3405.

DUE AS STAMPED BELOW.

FEB 07 2004

YB 122

111237

